Features

34 Giving All

The first National Guardsmen to respond to the Sept. 11 attacks at Ground Zero weren't wearing BDUs, but uniforms of a different color. They were part-time Guardsmen who are full-time New York policemen, firemen and security officers—people with two professions where life and limb can be the price of service. Four of them were killed that day. It's why to the New York Guard, the war on terrorism is so personal.

43 Difficult Transformation

The Army Guard plans to replace some of its old M-1 tanks with eight-wheeled armored vehicles—turning the heavy tank units into lighter, more deployable outfits. The Air Guard is also looking at new missions and aircraft. It's all part of the Guard's struggle to keep up with active-duty forces and find a place in the U.S. military's "transformation."

67 A Conversation with Lt. Gen. Daniel James III

The new Air National Guard director shares his take on the pace of operations since Sept. 11, modernization, transformation and diversity.

72 Dispelling a Myth

The perception is the Guard sat out the Vietnam War. While their numbers were small, Guardsmen did fight and die in Southeast Asia.

81 President's Report

Retired Maj. Gen. Ronald O. Harrison reviews what was a turbulent year for the country and a busy one for the Guard and the NGAUS.

84 Treasurer's Report

Retired Brig. Gen. Ken Ross reports that despite a weak market and no membership growth, the association remains sound financially.

100 Making a Museum

Construction workers and exhibit crafters are nearing the final building phase of the nation's only museum dedicated to the National Guard.
