A new administration has arrived in town, and with President Bill Clinton comes a new team at the Department of Defense (DoD) and in the Army and Air Force secretariats. We welcome them, and we look forward to four productive years of working with them.

We say this because, if President Clinton follows through on the statements he made to the NGAUS General Convention in Salt Lake City, the Guard should be able to concentrate on training and combat readiness rather than on fighting for the continued right to serve our country as patriotic Americans.

Most in the Guard would agree that the last four years were challenging. That we succeeded as well as we did is a tribute to your efforts and the tie to grass-roots America that you represent. The effort to promote the base force strategy, and its corollary to cut the Army Guard to 321,000 by 1995, was relentlessly and unironically pursued. Today, however, we find the Army Guard at 442,423 rather than on the proposed steep downward ramp. Thank you for your energy and commitment to telling the Guard’s story to the members of Congress and to the American public.

President Clinton’s appointment of Les Aspin as secretary of defense suggests a different future. Although Secretary Aspin also recognizes further cuts are necessary, he has indicated that the base force mix under base force was outdistanced. It was seriously debated in the legislative branch. Also, when Secretary Aspin chaired the House Armed Services Committee, he adhered to the constitutional mandate that the Congress is responsible for raising and supporting armies.

We also want to remind you that, during the campaign, President Clinton’s national security positions and platform planks were derived from substantial extent from the work done by Secretary Aspin and Senator Sam Nunn (D-Georgia), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. The Aspin and Nunn agendas, although somewhat different from each other, were complimentary and a significant portion of each agenda made into the FY93 Defense Authorization Act.

While at Salt Lake City, candidate Clinton pledged to maintain the National Guard as a premiere combat army force. Today, Secretary Aspin has staked out a similar position, although with a different spin. One of the reasons he said he was so insistent about his combat reform initiatives (a series of proposals that many oppose) was his conviction that the only way to garner support for the Guard containing combat arms units was to improve the combat readiness of Army Guard infantry and armored units by increasing their working relationship with the active Army. This coming year continues to promise challenges and hard work on all of our parts.

New a few comments about the recently released Rand Study, mandated by the FY92 Defense Authorization Act...

Done by the Rand Corporation on a DoD contract, the study was directed to look at the mix of the active components, the Guard, and the reserves. One of our concerns, on preliminary review, is that the study seems to base conclusions on old information. The Army proposed a 20-division structure; our 10/10 proposal accepts the Army’s number, but our mix saves $1.5 billion annually. Rand proposes a 21-division army favoring the active component.

The Rand study also does not take into consideration the Guard’s domestic mission, interestingly, even during a time when Hurricane Andrew and the Los Angeles riots show how important our response is to these domestic emergencies. Nor did the study fully account for the deployability, performance and combat readiness of National Guard units during the Persian Gulf War nor did it address the current improvements, our measures being made to our combat readiness, specifically, through the combat reform initiatives I mentioned earlier.

Although we have not, at this date, completed an in-depth analysis and while we do not agree with certain parts of the study, we do support its study’s contention that more resources could be placed on the Guard and reserves. With sufficient support from the Army, a focus on the combat initiatives and proper resources, the National Guard can be ready in the time frame required by this nation. And we will work toward that end.

It is ironic that the news stories I have read about the Rand study talk about the Army’s requirement to work more closely with the Guard to improve the readiness of the Guard—something we have been preaching for a long time. Regardless, now is the time to look through the windshield and not the rearview mirror. In our April edition of National Guard, the magazine will feature a full expansion of the Rand study.

The hard work you, our members, have done in the past year and our support from the governors and other members of Congress, promises that, at a minimum, our vision will be heard and considered. We believe our vision will, in fact, gain more credibility and a back-ward-thinking thinking and views. This country needs to work with us to make certain all the National Guard to serve the American people.

WINTER GARDEN MANAGEMENT

National Guard

MARCH 1993
Volume XLVII, Number 3

FEATURES

The Arkansas Razorbacks Lead the Way
The Arkansas Army and Air National Guard members took great pride in being key elements for the 50th Presidential Inaugural Ceremonies, along with Tennessee, Alabama, Delaware, the District of Columbia and the National Guard Bureau staff. Change of command ceremonies like these highlight the Guard’s dual mission.

The Air Guard Delivers Relief and Hope
22

Gail Merrill McPeak, chief of staff of the Air Force, said it the last time the nation was embarrassed by the mobilization of Guard forces to Somalia to bring relief, “The Air Guard will say ‘Welcome to the war!’” Air Guard units had been flying into Kenya and Somalia since last August.

Drawing the Bow in William Tell
26

Every two years, Total Air Force fighters flock to Tyndall AFB, Florida, to draw bead on enemy target drones to determine who is best at the job. This year’s winner was an active Air Force unit out of Japan. But the Air Guard made an outstanding showing with the likes of Capt. Duane J. Kautzmann, who was top scorer.

The Guard’s Own Historical State Camps

30

In Waco, May 30, was once the site of gathering citizens to see Sunday afternoon military maneuvers from a large grassy field in the community and the Guard together once a month.

A Rough Winter Brings Out the Guard

32

The Guard is always ready. Even if it snows or sleet—the mailman always delivers! Usually, it’s the Guard member who has plowed the roads, dug out the abandoned vehicles and delivered food and water to ensure that the little boys in the neighborhood deliver the mail. Winter 1993 was not different from previous winters.

National Guard

March 1993

DEPARTMENTS

President’s Message

Volume XLVII

VOLUME NUMBER 3

WINTERTI

2

W ]).

2

2

2

2

PUBLICATION STAFF

MG Robert F. Enslin Jr. (ret.)

Editor-in-Chief

CPT Victor Dubina (ret.)

Director of Communications

CP Pamela A. Kane

Executive Editor

Maj Jean Marie Beall

Assistant Editor/Features

Ms. Belinda L. Reilly

Assistant Editor/Advertising

COL John C. Philbrick (ret.)

Advertising Sales

M. Catherine Privet

Controller

NATIONAL GUARD

MARCH 1993

THE NATION’S ARMED RESERVES

NATIONAL GUARD MAGAZINE (ISSN 0163-3940) is published monthly, by the National Guard Association of the United States, with editorial and advertising offices at One Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20005. (202) 222-2001. POSTMASTER: Send address changes to National Guard Magazine, 535 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20001.

Copyright 1993 National Guard Association of the United States. All rights reserved. All members of the NGAUS receive National Guard Magazine free of the membership dues as an on-lot magazine subscription. Non-member subscription: $25 per year. Bulk subscription rate for orders of 100 issues or more available at $10 each. This publication is the official U.S. Army National Guard voice on national defense, with emphasis on applicability to the U.S. Army National Guard. Permission to reproduce permission Article, section, or material is granted by the National Guard PRINCE: SANDFORD FORM 5597 TO NATIONAL GUARD; ONE MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE, N.W., WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001.

COVER: The nation’s Capitol glows at the outset of a new day and a new administration. The 188th Fighter Wing, Arkansas Air Guard, led the way for all at the inaugural ceremony. Tennessee’s 129th Army Band (inset) played in honor of Vice President Al Gore. Photo, NA Mark Bronich, USAF. Design by Johnson Design Group.